Ruminations...

I had a small bucket list of things I wanted to do this summer. One was purging my office of books and stuff, and at first glance, it may not look like it was done, it has been though but I must confess my upstairs room where all the books were dumped may end up being next summer's project. There are two items that are in process – a report on the survey results and a report from the Finance Council. I also wanted to get my bicycle in order. It has been hanging in the garage for over six years now and it was always with the best of intentions... Anyway, I lowered it off of its rack in the garage and sprayed all the cobwebs off of it. Then I filled the deflated tires with air and locked them into the frame. As I took it for a small spin around the parking lot, I discovered that the breaks weren't working and the derailleur was acting up. So I rolled it across the road to the bike shop. The technician took it and pushed down on things, and pulled at cords and spun the wheels, and flipped the breaks. He said that it was easy to see that the shocks were gone, and that replacing the shocks would be almost the cost of a new bike. Needless to say I was shocked, because I didn't even know that my bike had shocks. Bikes when I was growing up didn't have such things. Our shocks back then were called our bums. And certainly, shocks were not the selling point when I purchased it. In all likelihood, price was the determining factor not the shocks. So without wanting to sound too stupid, I asked for a bit more clarification about the shocks. So he explained that when I am going across forest paths and bumps and hills and other potential natural disasters or obstacles, it might be a rough ride and do damage to the bike since it can no longer absorb the terrain. In my head I heard myself say that it has never been nor as far as I know will it ever be subject to such abuse. He also explained their policy that a basic tune up is $80 and if any parts are needed under $20 they just do it and if it is over that, we will call for confirmation. I picked up a message on Sunday afternoon that a brake pad was missing and needs to be replaced. So as I sit here I am waiting for the phone call to come and pick up the shock-less wonder. If it seems I am walking a little bow-legged you will understand. Now if I could just find my helmet. It has only been six years or more since I had it last. Fr. Ray
