Ruminations

The other day I was rooting through the cupboard looking for the lettuce spinner. I had picked a fresh head of lettuce from my garden and wanted to prepare a delicious salad with home grown greens. At the back of the cupboard was one of those novelty cups with some joke about being 60 and needing extra handles. It kind of caught me off guard and I wondered if my mom had left one of her mugs around. Then it struck me like a burning lightning bolt, that senior's mug was mine. It was a tragic reminder compounded by the closing of the gyms during this pandemic. I have started to notice the little things, like how the ground is getting just a little further away, especially when something is dropped and needs to be picked up. I have become rather selective about what needs to be picked up immediately and what can wait until more favourable times. Or sometimes those plastic packaging that in days gone by were rather easy to rip open need a grunt or two or dare I admit, the kitchen scissors. The most recent one was the most distressing. I love the full sour Strubbs Dill Pickles. I had to purchase a new bottle and when it came time to open it, the lid wouldn't budge. Now being of healthy Irish people who have elevated stubbornness to an art form, I would not be defeated, nor would I resort to those kitchen tricks with hot water or banging with knives. This was a great act of defiance, man versus machine (or bottle caps as the case may be.) I was determined to vanquish this foe that stood between me and the admission of a reality first signalled by the hidden mug in the cupboard. I felt like I should have played the Rocky soundtrack on my iPod, but I didn't have it, though I'm thinking maybe I should download it. I took a couple of deep breaths and tried to focus myself into the Zone. I visualized how this would unfold, the cap releasing under my strength, and juicy sour pickle as the reward for my victory. I could taste it already, and I hoped that the anticipation would serve to unleash my adrenaline. I guess a hazard of being a Sports Administration grad, every competition no matter how small, plays out in my mind like an Olympic event. That gold medal podium was mine- I would not be denied. The first attempt was honourable, but unsuccessful. As bound and determined as I was to open this jar, the lid itself was equally determined to thwart my efforts. Round one to the jar. Thankfully no one was around to witness this competition. Round two - a couple of quick breaths and I grit my teeth and let out a primal wowl, and with great determination and prolonged force, the lid began to move so I took another breath and the lid gave way and the appetizing aroma or fresh dill pickles signalled that victory was mine. There was a bit of satisfaction that masked the real issue. Now like Samson, I fear that when I get my hair cut, all my strength will be gone, not because of any divine retribution, but because by the time the hair salons and barbers finally open up, it may be too late. These years are as golden as Greenland is green- fake news. I can't wait for the gym to open up again.

Fr. Roy

Confirmation Candidates & First Communion Candidates - Newsflash

We're so excited. We have been planning first communion and confirmation celebrations for the upcoming month of July. If you have indicated that you would like to proceed this summer, we will be in touch with you with dates for preparation and dates for the celebration. The numbers worked out great and our celebrations are a filled to capacity. Any others will be offered celebrations in the fall.

A Huge Thank You

At the deadline for printing, we still have 123 hours to go in our Prayer Vigil, and there are still some openings to participate. But we have had a wonderful cross section of our parishioners, and friends of the parish come and spend an hour offering prayer on behalf of the families of the victims of the residential schools, their horrific treatment by members of the Church who should have been protecting their God-given dignity, and treating them as children of God. We have no answers, no excuses, and no reasons. The only response is prayer and it has been inspiring to see the Parish come together for something of such importance and gravitas.

Let us pray for the sick...
