Ruminations

Mothers' day was a mishmash of events all rolled into one. Since all of us have birthdays within a 6 week time frame, it was easier for my old grand aunts to get it all over in one fell swoop. So each mothers' day meant that we would dress up in Sunday best clothes, (not sure why because we were heading over to the farm where we young ones were relegated to the outdoors which inevitably ended at the barn and the hayloft swing- which was never meant to be a swing but rather a hoist, but it was a terrific swing none the less) and hop in the car for a birthdays/anniversary/Mothers' day lunch, replete with mini Champaign glasses stuck in the cake to toast each and every one of us. As the years went by, and the necessity to pool our money for large household items diminished it meant we had to collectively become more creative in the approach to gifts. One year we decided to get mom tickets to see Les Mis. Between mom and dad, mom was the more adventurous and dad was the home body. The only live theatre mom had seen before was grade school Christmas plays and high school drama productions starring yours truly. Of course the expectation was that dad would accompany her, though we all knew it would be a tough sell. Dad acceded and went and it was with great excitement that we peppered them with questions when they returned home. Mom was agog. She absolutely loved it. Dad's reaction was a trifle less enthusiastic, "it was nice, I guess, but don't do that again." So thus began the long tradition of mom coming with me to various shows in Toronto and Stratford. I have to admit that leaving musicals always leaves me a bit melancholy – so much talent, so little of it bequeathed to me, alas. In High School each year we staged a musical, well more an operetta, usually a Gilbert and Sullivan production. I was not permitted to be on stage, but back stage, painting and building sets. And each night's performance was like a sing along. I think The Mikado and Man of La Mancha are my all-time favorites. Mom was more partial to Les Mis and Little Shop of Horrors. So I must confess that I sometimes sit in my office listening to the practices for our own up-coming Broadway musical extravaganza on June 9th. I am kind of sad that mom can't appreciate it in the same way as she used to. Of course we would have playfully argued about which was the favorite piece. I anticipate being exhilarated and a bit envious at the same time. If the truth be known lots of these singers have done duets with me without even knowing it, them in the church at rehearsal, and me belting it out in my office. In my mind at least, "I oughta be on Broadway...." See you at the concert, and I promise, I will only sing to myself. Happy Mothers' Day.
