Ruminations

I think I will name my recent escapades as the Great Purge of 2018. It has been almost three full months since I have any other beverage than water—maybe a bit of peach juice from my breakfast serving of peaches, but nothing but boring water. As much as I would still love to sit down and relax with a nice cold Coke Zero, that gives that startling burning sensation as it goes down, the memoirs of the withdrawal foginess and headaches motivates me to hold off a bit longer. I wasn't a big mild drinking but one of the treats I learned from my father was a nice cold glass of buttermilk in the summer as an ultimate thirst quencher on those sweltering days of August—none of that either. Oranges were high on my list that I had to eliminate and as much as I loved the sunshine fruit, the substitution of peaches has made it tolerable, though when I am in the grocery store and see these beautiful large colourful navel oranges on sale, there is a bit of temptation there has been no rice, no potatoes (o.k. a bit of cheating with the odd serving of fries from Swiss Chalet, but I think it was more for the sauce than anything else, after all, Swiss Chalet fries pale in comparison to the gourmet selection at our Fish Fries. If nothing else, seven years at the Drive In taught me how to make fries. Only recently has there been a bit of pizza slipping into the menu, but to be honest, it just hasn't tasted as good as I remembered it. It might have something to do with the lack of Coke Zero to burn it down the gullet. Although there was an elimination of thirty foods, I really haven't missed too many of them, in fact, it has been wonderful to decline beans for medicinal reasons. Well, that's my excuse. There have been some tangible benefits and some intangible ones that have made it a worthwhile and educational exercise. It has cleared up some gastro-intestinal problems. It has cleared up some issues of dry skin on my face. It has necessitated the purchase of smaller belts and pant sizes. But is really was eye opening to see how much what we put in our body affects our everyday life, unbeknownst to us. In fact, I learned that lesson or had an epiphany around 3:00 am one morning last week. It has been a particularly busy and crazy day and my eating schedule was way of kilter. As a diabetic that is not a good thing. Well as I was driving around from this to that, I resorted to a drive through of a particular golden arched fast food joint. Again, the taste after all this time of food avoidances, was not nearly as exciting or satisfying as I remembered. Even the fries lacked their salty appeal. Anyway, my body went into full out evacuation mode with a physical assault on me. I hope I have learned my lesson, cheaters never prosper, but as the old commercial said, "Wouldn't a Coke Zero go good now."
