Ruminations

It was rather a strange Thanksgiving this year, the first one when mom was not a physical part of it. Part of that was circumstantial with my brother who was to bring her for Sunday ended up sick and unable to make it, and then arranging for a Monday morning brunch. Well, as luck would have it, now it was mom who was not quite up for the outing so we soldiered on. The way our thanksgiving unfolded was a semi-family lunch on Saturday. The Sunday lunch for another portion of the semi-family meal was postponed and so then a spur of the moment plan was concocted to do a brunch on Thanksgiving Monday. At first I was hesitant, mostly because of my nature, my initial reaction or default starting point is always no. I don't do well on the spot, but the no affords me time to ponder and muse and then maybe reconsider. Part of me was intrigued because I love hearing of all the parish groups that continue the Eucharistic unity at Donnelly's family restaurant, or Mel's, or Tim Hortons'. It is a unique way of beginning to live the unity was have celebrated. Of course, Sunday brunch is not really an option as some people work Sunday mornings, and after the Sunday morning marathon, the need to put one's feet up and one's head down far exceeds the need to brunch- personally speaking. So it was with a bit of reticence that I agreed for a family brunch at the Buttery. This was a favorite eatery for my mom and dad. If there was a special occasion, the restaurant of choice was always the Buttery, birthdays, anniversaries, a Leaf's win, or just when the spirit moved them. Now since mom was not up to the excursion, it ended up being all my nieces and nephews, two sisters-in-laws, 2 brothers, and me. I have to say, for someone with very little experience with brunches, but lots of experience with family gatherings, it had to be one of the most relaxing, enjoyable ways to gather together as family. Naturally mom was a hot topic of conversation, well maybe not so much conversation as the subject of many a humorous remembrance. It was wonderful for the younger generation to be able to hear the stories of our youth and our memories of grandma while we were growing up. The younger generation has such a limited to non-existent connection to my dad who died so many years ago, it felt fulfilling to be relating these stories, the true heirlooms on to them. I guess that is what will elicit the truest sense of thanksgiving. So even though mom was not physically present, sure her spirit and the spirit of dad permeated the stories and the attitudes and the memories. It certainly was a different kind of Thanksgiving but there was still much for us to give thanks.

Fr. Roy

This past Sunday most of the little First Communicants expressed how the music/ choir was their favorite part of Mass. The cookies in the parish hall were a big hit, too. We can all learn from the children's enthusiasm for Church.
