If we had been allowed to put dibs in for what talents we could be born with, singing and painting would be up there for me, along with a whole host of others, but alas these were not meant to be in my repertoire. Another skill that seems to elude me is the talent for vacation. In a word, I suck at it. No matter, I have had some great adventures through the years- Banff and Whistler pop immediately to mind. I think my ideal vacation, as is fitting for an introvert, would be far away from the maddening crowds amidst the towering white pines, the pristine lakes and the solitude of the Canadian Shield, as long as there was indoor facilities and no bugs – I'm not a fanatic after all. That would recharge the batteries, a bit of music, a few good books, and a place to roam safe from bears. What can I say, I am a shopping cart naturalist. That is kind of what I hoped this quasi vacation was supposed to be. One thing I learned though, is that two days here and one day there does not a restful vacation make. It had a rough start. I got away much later than I wanted, waiting for repairs to our projection system. I had googled directions and of course I wanted the faster way, not the easier way. MISTAKE. Some of the roads on the google map were misnamed and early on I missed an important turn. Instead of heading to Little Britain, I ended up in Brechin. Now with all our modern technology at hand, one would think that this would be easily rectified. With no GPS and no data on my phone, and of course in this day and age, where can you every buy a map, I was at the mercy of finding a Wi-Fi friendly place. Enter Tim Hortons. So I snuck in to a corner, hooked up my phone and whispered to Seri about getting back on the trail to Lindsay from where I was. Off I went following backroads eventually stumbling upon highway #7. By this time it was getting dark and the instructions from google were becoming hard to read in the waning daylight. I wended my way along roads convinced that I was lost yet miraculously I found my lodgings in Burleigh Falls. It had taken an hour longer and I erroneously assumed that there would be ample places to pull over and gas up and have a bite to eat. The only food I saw on these backroads was road kill. I had called the hotel ahead of time and good thing I did. There is no front desk service 24/7. It shuts down at 4 pm and so the clerk promised to leave the door to my room unlocked which she did. So with empty stomach, frayed nerves, and a looming for what was to come, I settled into my bed to await the coming of the morn. There is nowhere to go but up. Fr. Roy
