Third central theme in recent Church teaching on the environment

3. "Human Ecology" and its Relationship to Environmental Ecology

If ecology implies a system of relationships and interactions, then we can say that maintaining a proper ecology of our natural environment is only possible when we foster a truly "human ecology," that is, when we promote human relationships and interactions that respect the dignity of the human person, the common good, and nature. This is because of humanity's unique place in creation. Central to this human ecology is the right to life of every human being, from conception to natural death.
