THE VIRTUE OF OBEDIENCE

But Christian obedience is never a form of unthinking servility. We have brains for a reason. Christian obedience is an act of love. It's a free gift of the self, and when obedience to authority becomes mechanical and excessive, or worse, if it serves a bad end, it crushes the spirit. All real love—and especially the love at the heart of a healthy obedience—is ordered to truth. Spouses have the duty to speak the truth to each other, charitably and respectfully, but also honestly, even when it's unwelcome. Life in the Church is no different. When authority undermines itself with corruption, falsehood, ambiguity, brutishness, cowardice, or mismanagement, fidelity to the truth requires faithful Christians to resist and challenge it. So again, why do we need the Church? We need the Church because Jesus Christ founded her to be his witness, and to continue his work in the world. We need the Church because she's the living body of Christ in human affairs. She's our mother and teacher in what it really means to be a Christian. She's the guardian of the Word of God. For Catholics, she's our sacramental home where we find the source and summit, the joy and consolation, of our Christian life—the Eucharist. She's the community of believers, encouraging, correcting, and supporting each other. She's the pilgrim people of God across borders and centuries, leading the human heart to where it can finally rest in the love of its Creator. And we need the Church because she's the living memory of our redemption, our identity, and our purpose in whatever time God gives us. - Cardinal Charles Chaput, First Things Journal
