VOCATION: THE DISCOVERY OF ONE'S IDENTITY

Among the titles which the Bible attributes to God, there is also: he who calls. With his right hand, he stretches out the heavens, calls them and "they all stand forth together" (Is 48:13), listen to his orders and fulfill their vocation, whirling in the universe and singing his praises: "The heavens declare the glory of God and the work of his hands the expanse proclaims" (Ps 19:2). Nothing and no one are anonymous before the Lord who "counts the number of stars and calls each one by name" (Ps 147:4).

The name that God gives to every person corresponds to an identity, a vocation, a mission. Nothing intimate, external to the person, nothing that looks like an election prize for a previous loyalty. Vocation is but the discovery of that for which we were created, the place we are called to fill in the creation and God's plan. It is not revealed through dreams and visions. Still, it is found by looking inside ourselves, listening to the word of the Lord that is heard, not seen, which is manifested in the events and speaks through the angels who stand beside us: the brothers and sisters in charge of interpreting to us his thoughts and his will.

To correspond to the vocation does not mean getting involved in a cumbersome undertaking, externally imposed, but to realize ourselves, be faithful to our identity, and, therefore, achieve interior balance and joy.
