MASS MINUTES

Concerning the Offerings and the Sacred Vessels

The Church has some established norms for the composition of the vessels (such as the chalice) and the bread and wine offerings to be used during the Mass. The requirements arise both from the sacredness of the offerings and the need to ensure the validity of the Mass. A Chalice must be made from precious metal, such as gold or silver. Other precious materials can be used as long as the inside cup portion of the Chalice is covered in gold. The same regulations hold for the other sacred vessels that contain the Body and Blood of Christ. Before the Mass, the chalice is set with several items for use in the liturgy. A white piece of linen cloth with a small red cross in the middle, called a Purificator, is placed folded over the chalice. The priest uses the Purificator to wipe the chalice and other sacred vessels after the distribution of Holy Communion, to ensure that no particles of the Body and Blood of Christ are simply left to go stale or bad in the vessels and to ensure due reverence is given to them. Though the vessels have generally been rinsed with water before the Purificator is applied, the purificator does sometimes come in contact with the Eucharist, so it is washed in a special way to ensure that no Body or Blood of Christ ends up in the sewer. The patten is placed on top of the purificator on the chalice. The patten is a sacred vessel because it contains the host that the priest holds during the consecration. Above the host and the patten, the pall is placed. The pall is a thin stiff piece of board that functions doubly as structural support to the articles placed above it and as a means for keeping things such as dust or insects from getting into the chalice during parts of the Mass when the patten is not over the chalice. The chalice veil goes over the pall covering the whole chalice beneath it. The colour of the veil matches the liturgical season. By adding the visual beauty of the Mass, the veil contributes to the spirit of reverence and worship. Above the veil is the burse, which consists of two thin stiff pieces of board encased with cloth in the colour of the liturgical season. The primary purpose of the burse is to contain the corporal. The corporal is a piece of linen cloth with a small red cross on it. During the offertory, the corporal is unfolded on the Altar and all the sacred vessels are placed upon it. The corporal's material and the way that it is folded and cleaned ensures that if any particles of the Body and Blood of Christ fall on it, they will be treated with due reverence. The divesting of the chalice that takes place during the Offertory when all these items are taken off the chalice symbolizes the stripping of Christ of His garments in preparation for His crucifixion.
